

1.1 Sensory Grid of Reality: The World as a Digital Image (Pixels and Micro-pixels)

This world is not material in the sense that academic science taught us from inside the simulator. It is a highly advanced, dynamically projected digital image. And most importantly: even people themselves with their physical bodies are precisely such rendered images (vyrenderovaný – computer-calculated, generated, and transformed from pure data into a visible, tangible, or sensorially perceptible form similar to a 3D object in a graphics program).

Our flesh, bones, and organs are in fact merely a data stream in the sensory grid of reality (Matrix Grid), adjusted for the sensory user interface.

Imagine the screen of the most modern monitor. When you look at it from a distance, you see a smooth action, wonderful colors, and coherent shapes. However, if you approach the screen to within a millimeter, you will find that the entire perfect world breaks down into millions of small, separate glowing points – pixels. And if you took a magnifying glass, you would see that each pixel consists of even smaller sub-components – micro-pixels.

This is precisely how the sensory reality that we experience daily is technically constructed:

- Sensory grid of reality (Matrix Grid): It is the basic supporting field, from our sensory perspective an invisible three-dimensional chessboard in which instructions and data flow. Everything we perceive, including our bodies, is merely the result of how our sensory interface decodes this data. It is the hardware (hardware) of our world.
- Information system (IS): Part of this grid is a continuous flow of internal program codes and instructions. Some of them are external – broadcast from Heaven. This system defines local physical laws, the density of matter, and the behavior of light, meaning anything that is part of the sensory world we perceive. Every object, every human body, and every being has its precise data address and unique identification card in this system.
- Pixels of reality: These are the basic structural elements of the cells of the reality grid (the three-dimensional chessboard), the smallest tangible building blocks that form the displayed structure of matter, time, and space in our sensory perception within the grid. Sensory data packets captured and processed by our senses are also created by them.
- Micro-pixels (have 3 levels): They represent deeper levels of energy generation and data programming. It is precisely at this micro-pixel level that the Source code of every manifested form is written – not only of the body, but also of thought, emotions, expression, and the technology of instant transformation of "matter" used by the ancient lineage of the White Juanovci.